Weekend 7 Service Resumes Track Work Finished Early

Normal weekend #7 Flushing line subway service has resumed between 61st Street, Woodside and Main Street, Flushing at 8:45 p.m., due to the combination of completed weekend work goals and the prediction of inclement weather and significant snow accumulations for the morning rush period MTA New York City Transit announced.

Service resumed after a test trains confirmed that all circuits, switches and signals were placed back in proper working order following the service shut down in connection with the second phase of a $76 million capital program to improve and upgrade the subway infrastructure along the Flushing Line.

Weekend service along the Flushing line was suspended between Main Street-Flushing and 61st Street, Woodside early Saturday morning in order to allow for the modernization of the line's signal system between Queensboro Plaza and 82nd Street, Jackson Heights. Included in this project is the reconfiguration of track switches in the vicinity of 74th Street-Broadway. When complete, the new signal system and switches will allow trains to cross between tracks and serve 74th Street-Broadway in the event that track work is being performed in the area.

"We realize just how much of an inconvenience this work is for our customers," said Lou Brusati, #7 Line General Manager. "Thanks to a lot of hard work and the cooperation of Mother Nature, we are in the enviable position of giving our customers what they rely on every day, and that's normal service."
