Grand Central Terminal Power Restored

All Stores, Platforms, Concourses and Passageways Open As Usual

MTA Metro-North Railroad announced this morning that full power has been restored to Grand Central Terminal. The railroad's ticket machines, website, Train Time app and departure boards are all operating normally. The railroad also has been able to restore full lighting to the entrance at 47th Street and Madison Avenue, which will remain open.

The railroad expects to operate normal service throughout the day using all platforms on both the Upper Level and Lower Level of Grand Central. The terminal's retail stores have also reopened.

Elsewhere in the region, because of the potential for winter icing conditions, Metro-North advises customers to be careful when walking on icy surfaces and always use the handrails when walking on stairways.

The railroad reminds customers of the Hudson Line that the Newburgh-Beacon Ferry and the Haverstraw-Ossining Ferry would be replaced by bus service because of ice on the Hudson River.
